

Designing an OPAC for Web 2.0

MAIUG 2006, Philadelphia
Casey Bisson

online now at
<http://MaisonBisson.com>

Q: What Is Web 2.0?

- Is it about Google or Amazon?
- Is it about tags or folksonomies?
- Is it about AJAX or web applications?
- Is it about XML or web services?
- Is it about social software?
- Is it about buzzwords?

A: It's about people, not technology

“2.0” Is About People ...a lot of people

- Over 200 million Americans have internet access
(source: Internet World Stats and Nielsen/NetRatings)
- 94 million Americans use the internet
on an average day
(source: November 2005 Pew Internet Project report)
- 80% of US internet users believe the internet is a reliable source of information
(source: November 2004 Pew Internet Project commentary)

Web 2.0 is about critical mass

Claudele Tabion Says:

September 25th, 2006 at 5:56 am e

Hi...My name is claudele. I am doing a paper on Employee Privacy Rights in the Workplace. I would like to know if you have any information that will help me in my final paper on this topic. If you know any other website I can look at that will help me to better my final paper and have information that will make my paper a much better laid out one. So if you could please contact me with any information and if it may be information of your own the information I need to do the proper citations for it. Thank you for your understanding and patience.

Vs. Search Engines

“I wish I had known that the solution for needing to teach our users how to search our catalog was to create a system that didn't need to be taught...”

— Roy Tennant, Library Journal, November 15 2005

What To Do?

- Take advantage of the greater memory and processing power of today's technology
- Give patrons better information; leverage their ability to iteratively refine their search (examples: search clustering at Clusty and NCSU Libraries)
- Enrich the catalog display with non-inventory information
(examples: author biographies, reader's guides, subject information)

Challenges

- Usability
- Findability
- Remixability

Findability?

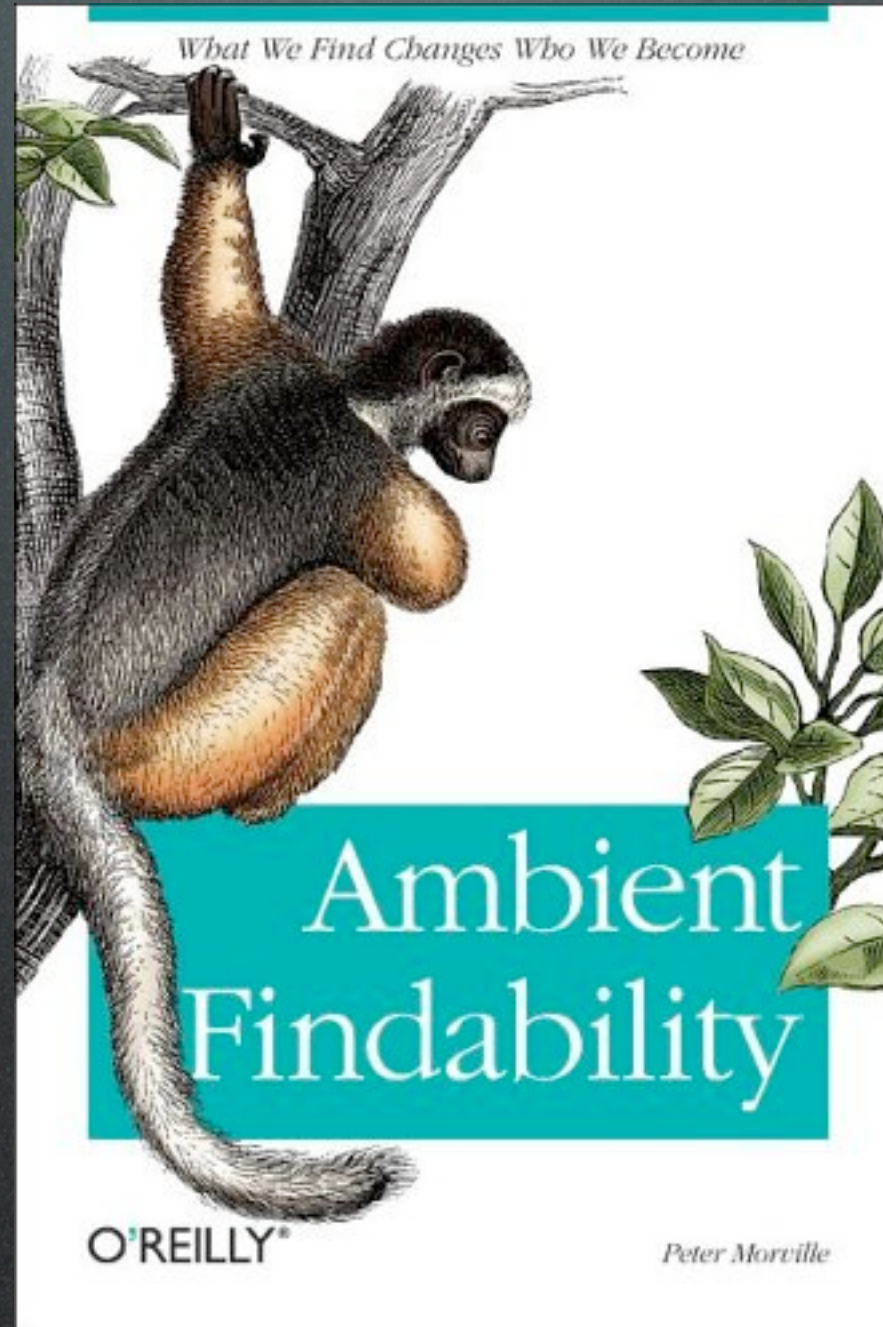

...yeah, this is about search engines

Where does research begin?

Think of it Like This...

- Search engines are like big OPACs
- We need to understand and apply the appropriate cataloging rules to get the results we expect
- Libraries can play a huge role, both as information providers and by providing “guidance” to those search engines
- We’re better prepared for this evolution than anybody else

The Basics

- Linking must be possible
- Linking must be desirable
- Linking must be measurable

Challenges to Linking and Indexing

- Most OPAC URLs are time or context sensitive (non-OPAC example: broken link)
- Many library resources can't be indexed; some require authentication, others tell search engines explicitly not to index them
- Some resources just aren't online

Opening Our Content to Linking and Indexing

- Put that content online, develop new materials online first (Story: OCLS in Orlando says online content used more often)
- Make sure indexing is allowed on your online content, eliminate barriers to indexing
- Make linking and bookmarking easy
(examples: Amazon, SpeakEasy Speed Test, and AADL)
